UNDP's bio-laboratory to fight pest species damaging biodiversity in Burchmulla, help preserve 10,000hectares of forest area 12/03/2021

The Burchmulla forest of Tashkent region is located on the foothills of the Western Tien Shan, with natural conditions favorable for the growth of more than 70 tree and 80 shrub species. Nevertheless, if prompt measures are not applied to preserve this forest's beauty, it is likely that insect pests will destroy it. According to experts, such pests can cause fruit and foliage losses of up to 40 to 45 percent.

Previously smoke bombs were used to fight tree pests and forest diseases. While this method showed good efficiency, it turned out to be inapplicable for environmental reasons because it destroyed pests and beneficial insects alike. To create a means of combating "enemies" of the forest, a joint solution was planned with the "Sustainable use of natural resources and forest management in key mountain regions important for globally significant biodiversity" project of GEF, UNDP and the Government of Uzbekistan.
